Could China and the US be on the brink of a new Cold War? Peanut butter and jelly are constants in the beginning of the last century. The idea of a new Cold War has been a popular topic recently. Do we really want to see such a scenario happen? If we do, we might be underestimating the risks. China and the US have a long history of conflict and cooperation. While there have been many attempts to avoid war, the risks remain. The current situation is complex and requires careful consideration. The US has been increasing its military presence in the region, while China has been expanding its economic and political influence. This has led to a situation where both countries are looking for ways to assert their power. It is important to remember that a new Cold War would not be the same as the one in the past. The world is different today, and the consequences of such a conflict would be much more severe. Therefore, it is crucial to work towards a peaceful resolution and prevent the escalation of tensions. The Thucydides Trap is a warning that we should not take lightly. It is a reminder that even small actions can have large implications, and that we must be cautious in our dealings with others. We must work towards a world where differences are resolved through dialogue and cooperation, rather than through conflict and confrontation. Only then can we avoid the disaster that Thucydides warned of.